

How Often Should You Provide Content?

This varies widely depending on the government agency. How much new information do you have to share? How much new information can you find to share? Of course, how much content you provide heavily relies on how much time you are able to devote to the task ? given all your other responsibilities. Be realistic but as a general rule, post new content as often as you possibly can.

Schedule Content

Being consistent is the key to creating and managing content effectively. One way to make sure you are consistent is to stick to an editorial calendar. An editorial calendar is a blueprint for keeping you on track of articles, blog posts, reports or anything else you plan to publish on your site. In short, it's a place to map out what is going to be produced, when and by whom. Editorial calendars are usually planned out for the next 3-6-9 months and in some cases, even a year ahead.

Interactive Blog Schedule
File Edit View Insert Format Data Tools Add-ons Help
View only
Blog No.
	B	C	D	E	F
	Topic	Author	Category	Audience	Submit Date
	The importance of Assistive Technology	John Rempel – AMAG	Product	All	7/6/2016
	Our Team: Our Purpose	Chelsea Stephens	Marketing	All	7/6/2016
	10 Ways to Improve Your Site's SEO in 2016	Peter Lee	Marketing	Agencies	7/12/2016
	The three tenets of Georgia's web presence	Nikhil Deshpande	Strategy	Other States	7/12/2016
	Purge Content in 5 Easy Steps (And Why You Should)	April Lentini	Content	Agencies	7/26/2016
	User Testing: Test mobile app	Jasmyne Dove	Testing		7/26/2016
	DrupalGovCon	Nikhil Deshpande			8/2/2016
	App Testing/Moderator Perspective	Johann Lohrmann	Business Analysis		8/8/2016
	Accessible, Responsive and Performant	Kendra Skeene	Product		8/15/2016
	Migrating 3 Sites - EPD	Chelsea Stephens	Content		8/22/2016
	User First	Nikhil Deshpande	Strategy		8/29/2016
	Agency content strategy (plug handbook?)	April Lentini	Content		9/5/2016
	NASCIO Award - Process of Accessibility Initiative	Kendra Skeene	Marketing		9/12/2016
	How to make content accessible, responsive & perform	Rachel Hart	UI		9/19/2016

The editorial calendar for Georgia Interactive's blog is maintained in a Google spreadsheet.

Some helpful information to keep in the heading of your spreadsheet:

- Deadline / publication date
- Content type (blog post, email newsletter, guest article, etc.)
- Topic
- Author(s) / editors / approvers for submission
- Target audience

Brainstorm Ideas For Content

It takes some foresight and effort to craft a content plan for your editorial calendar. If you plan on maintaining a blog with some consistency, you need to schedule a brainstorming session. Come up with article ideas that fit your agency and your audience. Timing is important. If you run the blog for the Georgia Department of Transportation [1], for example, it's helpful to know when hurricane season is to share emergency plans or when big events are expected to clog up traffic in different areas of Georgia.

There are two breeds of content:

Seasonal Content

Seasonal content refers to topics that are created and influenced by the time of year. Holidays, back-to-school time or tax season are examples of timing that could inspire article or blog ideas. Taking into account the season when creating and planning content is necessary for your editorial calendar. Leveraging seasonal search terms helps you deliver the right content at the right time – the fundamental law for an effective content strategy.

Evergreen Content

Evergreen content refers to material that is relevant or needed all year round. Child support laws, consumer news regarding identity theft and statistics for businesses relocating to Georgia are all examples of evergreen topics. Evergreen content makes up the bulk of your website. Case studies, how-to guides, white papers and site pages describing your services are all evergreen content types.

Update Content

The article that imaginary Bob wrote in 2014 about the top 5 Georgia exports is evergreen content that needs updating. Anyone can search for “top Georgia exports” at any time. However, if they come across an article that is 3 years old, they are not likely to trust it and move on because a 3-year old blog post is considered old news in Google land. The top 5 exports may have changed. But even if the exports have remained the same, the published date is a dead giveaway that the information has not been updated. Credibility is compromised.

With your evergreen content, you may already know which posts or topics have been most successful. Refreshing evergreen blog posts with new information or material is a great way to keep the fire burning with content that has already performed well in the past. (School textbooks update content almost every year. They update the content with new, timely examples, and increase the price.) When updating evergreen content, stay focused on tutorials or tips that will be relevant for a long time.

Repurpose Content

Repurposing content is finding multiple ways to reuse a successful article or blog post (keyword: “successful.”) If you find that one of your blog posts is showing up in search more or getting more traffic than other blog posts, take advantage of that. Take the content, research or idea and find multiple ways to reformat it. It’s perfectly fine to stretch the contents of your work to produce other unique blog posts, ebooks, guides, infographics, guest posts, social media posts and more.

Let’s say, for example, that your agency conducted original research and compiled it into a white paper. Sure, white papers are not the most exciting read, but you put in a lot of work and have some good nuggets of information on your hands. You could use pieces of data from the white paper to create infographics or blog posts. Turn selected charts into graphics and use those as social media images for an interesting blurb on your findings.

Advantages of Repurposing Content

- Work smarter not harder
- Stretch your resources
- Publish across multiple platforms
- Reach more people

3 Techniques to Repurpose A Blog Article

-

Summarize or Expand Previously Published Blog Posts

Summarize or expand blog posts you've already covered. For example; If you have 10 blog posts on the topic of buying a used car, summarize them into one helpful blog post people can quickly refer to.

People love short, easy-to-quantify pieces of information. That is why so many titles begin with a number. ?5 Ways to (fill in the blank)? or ?Top 10 Places to Visit in Georgia? and other numbered titles are generally a hit. So, if you wrote a blog post titled ?3 Ways to Repurpose Content? take one of those ways to expand on and make it into a more detailed blog post.

-

Create a Presentation

Recap the highlights of a blog article, add some interesting statistics, some meaningful quotes and some engaging images and you have yourself a slide presentation. Publish the slideshow on Slideshare [2] or Prezi [3] and you have an opportunity to engage with others on social media.

-

Design an Infographic / Instructographic

It's been proven that visual content engages people's attention. Infographics [4]

lend well to facts and statistics while instructographics [5]

work well with how-to content. Both infographics and instructographics take complex information and break it down into easy-to-understand text and graphics. Learn more about the importance of infographics and how you can implement them on your website with this blog series [6] from our UI Designer.

Source URL: <http://portal.georgia.gov/interactive/book-page/how-often-should-you-provide-content>